Dear Hiring Team,

Most of the small-business owners I interviewed at Dell weren't confused by the products. They were confused by the checkout: quotes, payment terms, and account steps written for a procurement department they didn't have. I redesigned that flow with plainer wording and clear progress indicators, and it's the work that made me want to keep designing for people who run a business and don't have time to learn ours.

[Company name]'s posting describes a Product Designer role at a B2B SaaS fintech, and that Dell experience is the closest match I have: two years of B2B e-commerce from interviews and flow mapping through specs and implementation review. [One sentence on what the company's product does, from its site, and the part of it that connects to that checkout work.]

Since then I spent three years at H-E-B leading design for customer-facing and internal tools, where my biggest project was a guided AI assistant inside the Salesforce tools support reps use on calls. That meant interviewing associates and managers, mapping how they actually decide on a refund, and designing a flow that fit. In prototype testing every participant completed their tasks. This year I've been freelancing for small businesses, including a pharmacy and a lost-pet app, and building my own sites with Claude Code and Codex.

Financial screens have a particular kind of pressure: a wrong number costs real money, and the person on the other side usually has a customer or a deadline waiting. I like designing for that moment. If the role is still open, I'd enjoy talking about what your team is building next. Thanks for reading.

Best,
Marcos Rios
