Dear Hiring Team,

The first design system I owned was for a city. Hutto, Texas, was growing fast and its materials looked like they came from six different towns, so I interviewed residents and staff, wrote the brand guide, and spent two years making sure every flyer, sign, and web page used it. The guide won two state TAMI awards, but the part I'm proudest of is that staff kept using it after I left. A system only counts if other people can build with it.

That's why your UX/UI Designer role for health tech and design systems stood out. If I've read the posting right, the hiring entity is Judi Health, and this summer Capital Rx became Judi Rx, with the member app and ID cards carrying over under a new name. A rebrand across a live pharmacy benefit product is a design-systems job and a trust job at the same time: every component has to change while the refill button stays exactly where a member expects it.

I've designed for that kind of member before. This year I redesigned the homepage of Lino's Pharmacy, a small pharmacy near the Texas border, so patients could find and use its text-and-call assistant for refills and medication questions, testing in English and Spanish and iterating from what people actually tapped. At H-E-B I spent three years inside a large design system, leading a guided AI assistant for support reps that every test participant completed, and working with content design on the wording of each state.

I grew up in Roma, Texas, translating forms and phone calls for family, so I pay close attention to the member who gets a confusing screen and quietly gives up. I'd like to help make sure that doesn't happen in Judi Rx. Thanks for reading, and I'd be glad to talk.

Warmly,
Marcos Rios
